
The Stars Sing

Again and again the same dream: an infinity of blackness rushes from the gaps between your mind's more mundane wanderings and pushes the theatre of sleep further and further away until you hang suspended in a sky stripped of clouds, surrounded by uncountable points of light; Where the earth should be below you are yet more stars and everything is filled with an utter stillness that seems to permeate your very being – this is not a creeping darkness that hides the unknown, but a panorama of emptiness greater than your sleeping mind can even begin to process.

After a few moments – or perhaps many lifetimes – the stillness is marred by discordant sounds, ethereal and formed by no means you can imagine. As you strain to hear these distant, wavering peals, the sounds solidify and harmonise: coalescing bit by bit into a discernable melody until, all at once, a melody emerges from the noise. Two stars build in intensity as the music takes shape: arranged one above the other, they burn with equal intensity – casting a searing illumination where all others simply sparkle. The immaculate white flames of the stars shimmer in time with the music – indeed their flames are the music.

As you listen you feel the strange, formless longing – a need for something you cannot define – taking root, seemingly in your very spirit. The same longing that follows you into your waking hours, fading – but never vanishing throughout the day.

You have, either by yourself or with the aid of those talented in such things, put the music to paper – but despite your efforts you feel that this is just one part of a greater whole. A greater whole that begs to be heard...
