Your debts to The Golden Prince are overdue. You insulted the City of Bridges by bringing Achilles into the negotiations, a course of action I explicitly told your friends you must not take.

And yet, we are not monsters in the City of Bridges. Prospero is clear that you were entirely right to surmise that he did not require you to die in order to pay off your debts.

Seek me out and make payment of interest – in the way that Prospero has instructed me to extract interest from you - and that will buy you a season's grace. A season to consider how you will repay your debts. To make Prospero an offer that does not involve his enemies.

I will establish a base in Anvil and leave word at the Hub where I can be found. You would do better if you found me or I at the least had word that you were seeking me out before I have to send messengers looking for you.

You may leave the business of the Star alone from now on.

May you not be too poor in favours and friends
